1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a process for coating structures, in particular micromechanical optical and/or opto-electronic components in such a way that contaminating ions present in the drift gas of an ion beam and/or in a reactive gas to be used in the coating are destroyed and at least a part of the positive charge is neutralized, as well as a control circuit and a corresponding coil of the ion beam source for realizing it.

2. Description of the Related Art In the manufacture of micro-electronic components, generally photolithographic processes are used in order to simplify the fabrication of micro-structures, on which subsequent structure-forming processes, for example etching or anisotropic and/or isotropic reactive deposition, are then carried out. Certain processes known as selective plating, in particular, for example, of Acheson coatings, are used at present in order to create a functional thin reflective coating for optical components, such as silicon lenses or photonic structures, which comprises a metallic free-floating thin film. In the process, ions of a suitable reactant gas, generally carried by an inert gas, diffuse or are carried into a vapor phase by heating. The intense neutralizing process of the coating material has to be carried out expediently, for example, at temperatures of as low as  $-60^{\circ}$  C. or less. A detailed description, regarding the suitability of this process for use in the manufacture of optical components on the basis of silicon substrates,
